D. A. Mosher struck quite a rich find one day last week. He had noticed honey bees passing in and out of a knot hole in the siding of his house on his farm east of Yale during the past summer and he rather suspected that they were making deposits on the inside. One day last week he borrowed a nail puller of John Hutton and removed the siding and was amply repaid for the trouble by finding about 200 pounds of honey in the comb deposited between the studding of the house. It was a profitable find.
